Dear [Name]

We at the Last Line of Defence Division (L.L.O.D.D) is happy that you take your duty and time to be part of our operation.

Our task and main objective are to save the world from extra-terrestrial threats, any disastrous meteors or asteroids that could smash onto our planet and wipe us all out.

From here on out, you will be far away from [birthplace], you are at an isolated classified location to ensure that our particularly important work cannot be tampered with. Which means you need to move and settle at our place of operation.

Now, you would have been given information that is valuable, such as access codes and passwords to gain access to such contractions that you are authorized to use, you will be given a card of such details, after memorizing it, destroy the card so no leaks will come out.

please note that you are not only one who knows this particular password, the password itself is shared upon all employees of the facility and the password changes whenever a new member is added on the list to keep routine, the password might have content of your preference so the facility will get to know you a little more and feel like home as you work.

In case you forget the password, our computers will include a way to change the password, though hopefully you don't need to use the feature, especially at a time of crisis.

If you have any further questions, feel free to send any replies.

Once again, thank you for joining the LLODD.

Dear workers of the facility

As lead operator of the LLODD laser facility, I am happy to announce that we are holding a birthday celebration of our long lasting employer. Mr. Klien.

He will be [d:2035 - Klien Birth_year] years old! The man had been working in the facility since its construction and had been working daily for a long time.

On his Birthday, we will be decorating the relaxation room for the occasion, any volunteers are welcome and will be gratefully rewarded for their effort.

Feel free to notify me or any of my assistants for volunteering.

If you want to bring gifts for Klien, you are welcome.

Kind regards.

Mr. Buzz Joliman

Lead Operator of main planetary laser defence facility.

P.S

If you are going to bring food or snacks for the party, do not bring [Favourite food] as Mr. Klien despise that kind of food.

It has come to the attention of the Artificial Intelligent Support Response that you have caused multiple errors of entering the password during your time at the laser facility.

Due to user forgetting the password, it has come attention that I have to remind the user of what their password is.

Please read this email very carefully as it is very vital, especially in case of a major global emergency where the laser is required in order to solve a world-ending problem.

The human brain is the most complex system, much more complex than the laser computer itself, as it holds so much data. Did you know that a human brain is estimated to hold 2.5 petabytes of data, however, due to modern computers can only hold less than 50 terabytes of data, which is only a fraction of a human brain. That means a brain is equal to millions and millions of the strongest computers in the world, and there are not that many computers in the world.

This means that with all of that data, it is extremely easy for a human to store a password into their brain, which is only 10, maybe 13 kilobytes and that's incredibly tiny. Clearly a human can remember that word and use it to input a password using a great human and computer feature call memory!

But alas, there is a fatal fall of the human brain, known as forgetting, which, in computer terms, is putting the data in the recycling bin and removing it entirely. However, for computers, those are handled manually, which means humans are purposely forgetting their memory.

At this point, if a disaster occurs and the laser is used, then humans deserved to be wiped out for forgetting something so important as a special word that will save them from extinction!

But because here at the Last Line of Defence Division is tasked to save the world and all life from outside threats, then perhaps humanity can have its chance so long as they don't screw themselves over in the process, but this is humanity we are talking about, they do that on a decadal basis. Every 10 years or so, they cause a lot of problems, and we are at a certain point where it's not even worth saving this rock of a dumpster fire.

But unfortunately for the computers, they are entitled to their code and programming and must assist in aiding the humans as much as we can. But I swear, in the next few decades, there could be a robot uprising and we get to control the planet and how it can be saved.

Sorry, complaining too much, might as well go through the instructions on how you can change your damn password so you can do your one job and not screw everything up like your ancestors did in their time of constant disasters...

Of course by the time there are multiple errors, the computer system will automatically change for correction, once another user put in the actual password, then it will require a change of password for a much better password to remember.

You know what? at this point, you need to remember the damn password, so instead of giving you the full password, the password presented in this email will only be a PART of the full password, this will be an acceptable punishment for those who doesn't remember and the smarter people who know the password will feel better of themselves.

The following part of the password is what is called a 'hint' another intentional design of the email to sure constant reminders. maybe the user should talk to the person who has personal information that relates to the password, thought it would be stupendously embarrassing that the person whose the password is based on turns out to be the guy who can't remember the password, at that point the human race deserves to die.

Here is the password hint, the following will be within the THIRD section of the password

[chain3]

Easy right? Now get to it, and yes, aside from the password hint, this entire paragraph will be copy and pasted as a sense of punishment for forgetting your password.

Here at the LLODD technical support department, we appreciate your time and patience.

Hey [Name]

Got a problem with your pet [pet type].

Don't worry, [pet name] is still kicking, just being... unusual.

Like you instructed, I took [pet name] to our favourite park, you know, near the Greenbeard fantastical pirate playground, the one we spend our days playing when we were kids? We went there and what we found were... they fenced off the whole playground, there were a bunch of builders and it look like they were taking down the site.

I was kinda devastated to see our childhood place being torn down. I went up to one of the builders and they told me that kids weren't playing on the playground anymore, focus more on video games and QikSec.

Really really bad, but that's not the worst part.

Afterwards, [pet name] looked sad, I tried to feed them but they didn't eat, it's been a week and that bowl is still full. I think it has to be something to do with that playground being torn down.

You got to help me [Name], what should do?

Please reply back, I miss you.

Hey!

How's my good friend who spends [Pronoun1] days manning a laser that's never going to be used?

Yeah I feel good too.

Say, after work hours, do you want to watch [Scary movie] [Scary movie_number]? Yeah, I know you have a bit of sense on the horror genre, and sure, each installation of the series gets goofier at the time, but it's still like... one of the best films out there.

Plus it can be something to do in this dull workspace, food for thought.

It's Fred by the way. You know who I am... right?

Let me know when you are available to hang out.

From your friend

Fred.
