“Originating from a place far from here, there's no place that AT-1225 and sentient train Ironhorse can't take you to. Just prepare your ticket and have a good time, for the journey to your destination is half the fun!”

Physical Appearance

Height: 5'6	Weight: IDK (something heavier)	Hair: Silvery white (it's made of fine strands of silver alloy)	Eyes: Bright yellow
AT-1225 stands a little less than average height (5'6), but is overall a sturdily-built unit. The base (skeleton) is made of a light-weight yet solid metal with appropriate joints and "muscles" (they're just several thick, metal wires). Thin metal sheets act as the "skin", with spacing between the joints, leaving the wires exposed on the insides of the joints (e.g. antecubital area). There are a few vents and fans for heat to disperse, with the main one located on the torso. The eyes are designed like a camera aperture with an internal light that can be brightened or dimmed when need be. The aperture design has led the eyes to be more expressive, similar to a cat. The mouth is similar to a speaker, with the voice box located in the throat. Within their torso, protected by layers of metal, are crystal fragments that serve as their battery, or "life force". It's best if it's one large crystal, but smaller fragments work as well. When on the job, AT-1225 wears wide, flowy navy pants that look like a skirt; a white button-down with the sleeves rolled up to the elbows; either a navy vest or an overcoat that reaches to the knees; a pair of white gloves; and comfortable shoes. There's always a hog head hat (train conductor hat) atop their head, along with a pocket watch. Sometimes, a scarf can be seen around their neck when the temperatures start to drop. AT-1225 carries very little at a time. The only things necessary are a tool kit for minor self-repair, a few snacks and water for others, a hole punch for tickets, and a good attitude.

Personality

Deposition: Ambivert

Hospitable x Inhibited x Industrious X Workaholic X Appreciative X Fanatical

By: kujiua-kun (Tumblr)

AT-1225 is described by others to be polite, enthusiastic, and a tad too loud. They do most things with a mixture of gravitas and excitement that shouldn't even work together, but it somehow does. Whether he's on or off the job, he's always giving his all to ensure that others are satisfied with his service. If there's any indication that someone isn't pleased, then by any means necessary, he'll jump in and turn that frown upside down.

As a result, they're also described to be dangerously selfless and a pushover. Unless doing the act would bring about danger towards itself or others, or it conflicts with its morals, there's a higher chance that it'll carry out an action to fulfill a request for someone.

They have unwavering faith that beings are good; that one's current actions and emotions are driven by the situation at the moment, and that it doesn't affect who they truly are.

She enjoys the mechanical clanking of gears and machines at work, and the physical sensation of pressing buttons and pulling levers. Those things remind her of herself, of how different she is from others. She was built with a predetermined purpose, and while she enjoys said work, it also wishes to explore. Considering the places within Athrevar that it has visited on its job, a sense of curiosity filled it. It wishes to see more while she's still a functional unit.

The only thing worse than leaving a customer unsatisfied is breaking down. Signs of breakage are warning calls for them to take better care of themselves, but if they rest to recuperate, how can they then take care of others? Such a complicated decision for them.

Best Trait: AT-1225 is a wonderful conversationalist, always finding a way to keep the talk flowing and knowing when to stop. It prides itself on being comfortable with long pauses as well.

Fatal Flaw: AT-1225 is a people-pleaser in and out. They will almost bend over backwards to ensure that someone wouldn't think ill of them.

Relationships

Ironhorse

AT-1225's sentient train and long-time friend, Ironhorse is described to be a steam train. It has several cars and is a little on the older side, yet sturdy. It has a silver coat of paint that perfectly highlights black bolts and other screws that keep it together. A single, bright light shines out the front of it.

Ironhorse communicates in creaks, slams, lights, and whistle blows. Ironhorse is also described to be friendly, and enjoys nice hot coal and plenty of water, as well as scheduled maintenance.

Whynn Westwood

Whynn is an interesting being to AT-1225. There are worlds within that brain of Whynn's, yet those worlds are made-up and unwilling to be shared so easily. If AT-1225 could travel within those worlds, he would! There would be so much to explore in there, along with many stories to listen to.

Unfortunately, it didn't seem like Whynn liked the conductor all that much. That confused her for the longest time. Was it not doing their job correctly? Most other passengers enjoyed the service provided, even if they were a bit weirded out by Ironhorse's sentience at first.

So imagine how relieved he was when circumstances caused the two to interact a bit more. She didn't push the writer to share more than they were comfortable with, even if it wanted to (because how rude would that be?).

The worlds that were revealed to them in the end were fascinating to listen to.

Backstory

From the moment that AT-1225 was activated, it's been drilled in its head that it was a machine. Made for a purpose and made to do that purpose perfectly. There was little room for failure especially when a mistake could lead to becoming scrap metal by anyone desperate enough to see it as prey.

The next thing AT-1225 learned was what skills it innately knew. It was programmed with the knowledge and skills on how to operate transportation vehicles, given an appropriate personality to deal with many types of beings, and the senses that it would need to survive. It was perfect.

At least, it seemed that way.

For the first few months of AT-1225's existence, it performed its tasks perfectly. It greeted passengers, punched tickets, operated the driver's seat, and was overall a well-oiled machine. It didn't crave for more, and it didn't compromise for less.

So what had changed for it?

A sentient train did.

Ironhorse was the train's name, and AT-1225 loved working with this train, whose creaks and slams communicated a language that the conductor learned to understand. It loved this train and refused to be parted with it.

With it, came a thought.

People had layers. They weren't as simplistic as they were. But if that was so, to better serve them, AT-1225 decided to better understand themselves as well. There had to be more to them as well. That thought spurred another one: If their hometown was as diverse as a person, what other places were there that they hadn't been to yet? What sort of people lived there?

And so AT-1225 continued their job, this time with a bit more diversity in how they did things. Anything to better serve their customers. As time went by, their rigidity in how they did their tasks faded, and people started to describe them as more animated. The younger ones called them funny, and it made their fans whir in happiness. People were starting to look at them less like a stepping stone, and more like someone they could hold a conversation with.

This came with another problem.

AT-1225 was afraid of revealing that they had evolved to be more than their programming. A robot, acting as if they had emotions? Now, who has ever heard of such a thing? However, their company's boss and their creators were interested in this development. They weren't static, they were growing. It was such an observation to behold! And why not show them off to other cities, other places?

So AT-1225 became independent with Ironhorse, traveling wherever the tracks lead the pair to.
